far inside "Germany," as the aviator calls all terrain the far side of "no man's land," and caught the enemy bringing up new balloons to replace those he shot down. He shot up two semi-inflated balloons on trucks as they were being brought up to take the place of two he had shot down the day before.

Finally, Luke's commanding officer, Major Hartney, told him he was working too hard and should take a week off and go to Paris. Luke finally agreed to take a rest, and packed his musette and went to Paris. But he reported back to the front on the second following day and insisted on getting back to work.

His commanding officer was insistent on Luke's resting up, so the balloon expert asked permission to make one more flight. It was granted and he flew to the line and shot down two more balloons within two minutes. Then he landed in a field near where an American observation balloon was located. From an automobile refilling station nearby he obtained gasoline and oil, and the mechanics there helped him turn over the propeller and get started when he flew.

Luke remained with the American balloon crew for two days, reporting in to headquarters at night by telephone and explaining when he was ordered to report back at his field that he was "en panne," that his machine was stalled and promising to get back in the morning.

Later Note: Lieutenant Luke has either been taken prisoner or met his death. On October 20th he flew over the German lines and did not return.
